Two men were killed and one was probably fatally injured by the blowing down of a house in the miniature tornado that this afternoon swept over the upper part of Manhattan Island. One of the men named Lawler died as a company of firemen was taking him from the debris.

Coroner Scholer, after an investigation, said that the house, which was in course of construction in One Hundred and Thirty-sixth street, near Riverside Drive, was poorly built. There was no lime in the motar, according to the Coroner. Inspector Sweeny has ordered an investigation, and an arrest is looked for to-night.

At the first warnings of the approaching storn, which came out of the West, the workmen on the building that was later destroyed scurried out of the meighborhood and sought shelter in characterism sevenue.
